

Right-to-Work Who's Behind It?

Right-to-work is supported by a nationwide conservative organization named National Right-to-Work Committee with ties to America's extreme right wing, including:

- The Michigan and U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the largest coalition of businesses in the state and country.
- Grover Norquist of American's for Tax Payer Reform and the anti-union Alliance for Worker Freedom. He is a close advisor to George W. Bush and the extreme right-wing of the Republican Party.
- Former Congressman Tom DeLay
- Moral Majority and its former leader, the late Jerry Falwell
- Wal-Mart
- For-profit Union busters – professional consultants or lawyers who profit off their ability to manipulate labor law, advising employers on how to thwart union organizing drives or how to get rid of workers' unions.
- Holland Coors of the Coors beer dynasty. The Coors family has a long history of hating unions.
- Republican Oakland County Executive L. Brooks Patterson, who said: "State lawmakers need to privatize some government services and consider right-to-work laws to fix systematic deficits to make the state more business friendly."
